

Giorgis's travels: The incredible adventure...Part V

Written by Sirak Habtemichael

---

It was winter and it started snowing before Giorgis knew it. "It was my first time to see snow in my life. I jumped up to the back of the car deciding to stay the night there but I couldn't bear the cold. I mean I had experienced cold weather before but this was quite something else. And on top of it, I had taken off and threw away my boots to help me run faster so I was on bare feet, which made it even worse for me."

Early the next morning, with the break of dawn, Giorgis had to wake up and maintain the stronghold of his hideout. He defied nature and refused to succumb to the coldest weather he encountered in his life. And everything he had done was just to get to the US and start a better life as a normal citizen. He stayed under the Ford until the doors of the company were opened and waited a little longer for the premises to be clear.

"I said to my self that this is my chance. I cleared the perimeter with my eyes and started to crawl out. But when I stood up all my hope faded away and I was left in despair when a firm had grip caught me from the behind. It was the morning security of the company; a very huge guy. With the winter cold of New York that hit me all night summed up with hunger, I didn't even try to run away. I just put my head down and mumbled in shock".

The search team from the ship had already reported to the morning and afternoon shift of the security for a man that fit the description of Giorgis because they last loose him around the area. The security kept him under his custody and started making a couple of calls. "The first phone call was to order me breakfast, which was indeed humane of him to do so and the second call was to the captain of the ship".

